

Leadership and Wolves

Learn how to perceive the world differently

New Date in November

The Talking with Wolves programme offers a fascinating group coaching experience to help leaders appreciate what it means to really develop ‘leadership presence’.

- How they ‘show’ up
- How they feel
- How effectively they communicate verbally and non-verbally

This involves inspiring deep trust by communicating a fundamental ‘ok-ness’ with oneself and others. People, like animals, and especially wolves’ will always on some level, ask the question “am I safe being with and following you?” We have a saying that ‘the truth leaks from every pore’ if we feel unsure and worried on the inside...no amount of play acting will disguise this being read intuitively/energetically by others. Thus, the first step in developing more personal leadership presence is for individuals to realise and work through any personal psychological blockers that may dissuade others from trusting them on an energetic level.

When we work with wolves, we engage in a conversation that does not require human language or social symbolism. We are then left with something else, something more immediate, more primal and more real. Gaining trust and being with the wolves requires switching our attention from our usual social presentation and needs (which means nothing to the wolf) to a focus on a basic and more primal somatic awareness and communication. We coach participants to switch their ‘intention’ and ‘attention’ to perceive the world differently and for the world to then perceive them differently.

Wolves are also an iconic example for typical human prejudice and projections, which can be both positive (wolf as spiritual figure for some, e.g. hunter-gatherers), or negative (wolf as a symbol of all evil; killing a wolf has been a scapegoat function of purging the world from evil. When we work closely with the wolves it can also serve to awaken us to the way we also form similar projections and prejudice towards other people.
